Recent research

A Georgetown researcher (Harry G. Preuss, MD, MACN, CNS, professor of physiology and biophysics) has found oregano oil may be an effective treatment against dangerous, and sometimes drug-resistant bacteria. Two studies have shown that oregano oil-and, in particular, Carvacrol, one of oregano's chemical components-appear to reduce infection as effectively as traditional antibiotics. Oregano Oil's effects were compared to those of standard antibiotics streptomycin, penicillin and vancomycin. The oregano oil at relatively low doses was found to inhibit the growth of staphylococcus bacteria as effectively as the standard antibiotics did. Research conducted by the same team found Oregano Oil to be effective against fungal (athlete's foot, Candida, Yeast, etc.) infections also. These findings were presented at the American College of Nutrition's annual meeting in Orlando
